Overview
Ending child labour and modern slavery – including forced marriage – in line with the targets of Sustainable Development Goals 5 (Gender Equality), 8 (Decent Work) and 16 (Just and Inclusive Societies) requires a dual-pronged approach (see box below). It is critical to use a broad lens to identify and challenge child and adolescent exploitation in all its forms, while systematically disaggregating its underlying causes and effects by gender, age, disability and other indicators of social exclusion.1

The scale and scope of the challenge
• Despite progress, there are an estimated 152 million children – 88 million boys and 64 million girls – engaged in child labour on a daily basis. Of those, approximately half are in hazardous work, over two-thirds are in agriculture, and nearly all are in the Global South.2
• The risks that adolescents face are diverse and are shifting alongside global processes such as urbanisation and migration.

Gender plays a critical role in shaping risk, with boys more likely to be in paid labour and girls more likely to work without pay behind closed doors.
• Nearly 30% of trafficking victims,3 and 25% of modern slavery victims,4 are children under the age of 18. Adolescent girls are disproportionately represented in both, in large part because they are especially vulnerable to commercial sexual exploitation and forced marriage.5
• Of the children in forced marriage, 96% are girls and 44% were made to marry before the age of 15.6

Child exploitation in the Sustainable Development Goals
Target 5.2 Eliminate all forms of violence against all women and girls in the public and private spheres, including trafficking and sexual and other types of exploitation
Target 5.3 Eliminate all harmful practices, such as child, early and forced marriage and female genital mutilation
Target 8.7 Take immediate and effective measures to eradicate forced labour, end modern slavery and human trafficking and secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour, including recruitment and use of child soldiers, and by 2025 end child labour in all its forms
Target 16.2 End abuse, exploitation, trafficking and all forms of violence against and torture of children

5 Ibid.
Key actions to accelerate progress

Renewed attention to the magnitude and breadth of adolescent exploitation, as part of the SDGs, is a necessary step towards eradicating it. As yet, however, there is still insufficient attention to the problem. By creating a broader lens, but failing to systematically disaggregate the underlying patterning and drivers of that exploitation, adolescents (and especially adolescent girls), who are already too often overlooked, risk being rendered even less visible in policy and programming. The devil, as they say, is in the details. We suggest that development actors invest in the construction of ‘bifocals’, which first let us zoom out, to understand the size and scope of the population of children facing exploitation, and then zoom in, to see the specific needs of different populations of children of different ages. This means delivering, at a minimum, on seven key priorities:

1. Address legal and policy gaps, and ensure appropriate budgeting to facilitate policy implementation, especially as they relate to the worst forms of child labour, trafficking, forced marriage, and modern slavery (as highlighted in SDGs 5, 8, and 16).

2. Provide free, quality education through secondary school, ensuring that options for older adolescents are flexible enough to accommodate the reality that many of them have to work to support themselves. This should include evening classes as well as bridge programmes to help school dropouts return to formal education.

3. Engage with the private employers who will be increasingly important to ending child labour, given the social and economic transitions unfolding across the global South, including urbanisation and the unprecedented levels of people affected by humanitarian crises. It is vital to create skills-building and labour market opportunities in general, and in humanitarian contexts in particular, where limited access to employment opportunities has forced young people into highly exploitative work situations.

4. Strengthen age-, gender- and disability-responsive social protection programmes so that families have a safety net and can avoid resorting to negative coping strategies such as child labour, forced marriage or begging. Provisioning needs to go beyond design, be sufficiently resourced for effective implementation, and be well monitored.

5. Invest in programmes that provide tailored support to the most disadvantaged adolescents, such as those with disabilities, domestic workers, survivors of trafficking, and child-headed households. Interventions need to focus on reducing the exploitation that these adolescents face and, where they have suffered trauma, provide them with psychosocial services, including through investment in social workers and other support staff.

6. Work with parents and communities through outreach activities such as community conversations and media campaigns to tackle the underlying discriminatory social norms on age, gender, disability, caste, etc. that leave children vulnerable to the most egregious forms of exploitation, such as forced marriage, forced labour and trafficking. Interventions should also provide young people with mentors and social support to help them identify – and fulfil – their own aspirations.

7. Invest in robust data and evidence that will reveal more precisely the magnitude and patterning of child exploitation, as well as assess programme impacts. Evidence-informed programming can contribute to strengthening the effectiveness and efficiency of programming especially in the most resource-constrained contexts.

---

An Ethiopian migrant domestic worker’s experience

‘When I arrived the first thing they did was to take my passport. I worked day and night, and not just for the family home in which I lived but for the entire extended family... I was beaten by the daughter in the house and by the daughter next door... They would even use laundry chemicals to burn by hands...’

‘...Soon after I arrived one of the sons started pestering me... several months later while I was in the shower he overpowered me. The last thing I remember was a really strong smell of chemicals. And when I woke up there was blood... After this I was too upset to work and the employers stopped my contract. They sent me home with no payment...’

There is no solution [to migration]... We can talk about our experiences, but girls with migration dreams simply won't listen... From 100 girls, 15% might get a good income. They just see 15% success stories rather than the failures.

(Ethiopian migrant domestic worker, returned from Saudi Arabia, 18-year-old girl)

---

Gender and Adolescence: Global Evidence (GAGE)

Gender and Adolescence: Global Evidence (GAGE) is a nine-year longitudinal research programme generating evidence on what works to transform the lives of adolescent girls in the Global South. GAGE is funded by UK aid from the UK Department for International Development (DFID).

The views expressed and information contained within are not necessarily those of or endorsed by DFID, which accepts no responsibility for such views or information or for any reliance placed on them.

This information is based on a forthcoming report which will be published on gage.odi.org/